Barnes's commitment to nursing extended beyond patient care. She recognized the urgent need for better nursing education and established the first nursing school in North Carolina at Watts Hospital in Durham. This pioneering initiative paved the way for the preparation of skilled nurses who would become the backbone of the healthcare system.

Breaking Barriers in Education

Barnes's influence extended far beyond the realm of nursing. She was an ardent advocate for women's education and believed that all individuals deserved access to quality learning opportunities. In 1915, she became the first female faculty member at Duke University, holding the position of Director of the Women's College. This appointment marked a groundbreaking moment for female educators and inspired generations of future leaders.

As an educator, Barnes was known for her innovative teaching methods and dedication to the well-being of students. She established the Student Health Service at Duke, ensuring that students had access to essential medical care. Her efforts extended beyond the classroom, as she played a pivotal role in the establishment of the Duke Alumni Association, fostering a lifelong connection between students and their alma mater.
