

The Hour Between Dog and Wolf: A New Generation of American Poets

The Hour Between Dog and Wolf is a new anthology of American poetry that features the work of 30 poets under the age of 40. The anthology is edited by Kevin Prufer and Mary Szybist, and it was published by Graywolf Press in 2020.

The title of the anthology comes from a line in a poem by the poet Robert Frost. In the poem, Frost describes the hour between dog and wolf as a time of liminality, a time when the old Free Download is passing away and the new Free Download is not yet born. It is a time of uncertainty and danger, but it is also a time of possibility.

The Hour Between Dog and Wolf is a fitting title for this anthology, as it captures the spirit of the current moment in American poetry. The old guard of American poetry is passing away, and a new generation of poets is emerging. These poets are writing in a time of great change and uncertainty, but they are also writing with a sense of hope and possibility.

The poems in The Hour Between Dog and Wolf are as diverse as the poets themselves. There are poems about love, loss, race, gender, and the environment. There are poems that are lyrical and meditative, and poems that are experimental and challenging. But all of the poems in this anthology are written with a high level of craft and intelligence.

The Hour Between Dog and Wolf is an essential anthology for anyone interested in contemporary American poetry. It is a showcase for the best and brightest new voices in American poetry, and it is a testament to the vitality and diversity of American poetry today.
