A Provocative Look at the State of Our Nation

In his new book, The Liberal Curmudgeon in America, Thomas Frank argues that the liberal establishment has failed to live up to its ideals. He writes that liberals have become too focused on identity politics and cultural issues, and have neglected the economic concerns of the working class. As a result, Frank argues, liberalism has lost its way and is no longer capable of addressing the challenges facing our nation.

Frank's Critique of Liberalism

Frank's critique of liberalism is wide-ranging and incisive. He argues that liberals have become too focused on identity politics and cultural issues, and have neglected the economic concerns of the working class. He also argues that liberals have become too cozy with the corporate elite, and have lost touch with the values of the people they claim to represent.

Frank's critique is not simply a matter of theory. He provides ample evidence to support his claims. He cites studies showing that the gap between the rich and the poor has widened under liberal presidencies, and that the incomes of the working class have stagnated. He also points to the fact that liberals have supported policies that have led to the loss of manufacturing jobs and the decline of unions.

Frank's Vision for a New Liberalism

Frank does not simply criticize liberalism; he also offers a vision for a new kind of liberalism that is more responsive to the needs of the working class. He argues that liberals need to refocus their attention on economic issues, and that they need to be more willing to challenge the corporate elite. He also argues that liberals need to embrace a more populist message, and that they need to reach out to working-class voters who have felt left behind by the Democratic Party.

Frank's vision for a new liberalism is ambitious, but it is also necessary. If liberals want to remain relevant in the 21st century, they need to find a way to speak to the concerns of the working class. Frank's book provides a valuable starting point for this conversation.
