

US Marine Corps Fighter Squadrons of World War II: The Legends

The United States Marine Corps Fighter Squadrons of World War II were some of the most elite and effective fighting units in the entire war. They flew the most advanced aircraft of the day, and their pilots were some of the most highly trained and experienced in the world. The Marine Corps fighter squadrons played a vital role in every major battle of the Pacific War, from Guadalcanal to Iwo Jima to Okinawa. They were feared by the enemy and respected by their allies.

The Early Days

The Marine Corps' first fighter squadron was formed in 1925. However, it was not until the outbreak of World War II that the Marine Corps' fighter squadrons began to come into their own. In the early days of the war, the Marine Corps fighter squadrons were equipped with the Grumman F4F Wildcat. The Wildcat was a capable fighter aircraft, but it was outclassed by the Japanese Zero. However, the Marine Corps pilots were able to overcome the Zero's superior performance with their superior training and tactics.
